

The technology developed by the satellite communications industry has revolutionized communication and provided healthy competition for legacy and terrestrial-based technologies and services. Although the current media outlets undoubtedly have a stronghold in the market at stake, it's unfortunate to see such an unfounded attack on innovation even mature to the point of serious thought, much less a petition.

I entirely support the legacy media outlets' attempt to provide resistance to the newcomers to the market. However, this battle should be done over the airwaves and free enterprise, not in legislation.

I personally subscribe to satellite radio to compliment the services already provided by the legacy media outlets. I greatly enjoy their innovation and look forward to new features, media, content, and ideas to be shared over this service without restriction from legislation.
